4) burndown chart

Reflection Questions:

1. Did your estimations reflect the actual effort?

Roughly yes, though it's hard to say precisely since this was a simulated sprint rather than actual dev work. Story 1.1 (Mentor Matching) got the highest points (8) since domain-based recommendation logic is inherently more complex than a straightforward CRUD feature like availability setting. In a real team, these numbers would get refined after the first sprint retro once actual effort is visible.

2. Was your backlog well-prioritized?

Mostly. High priority went to the core value-delivering features Mentor Matching, One-Click Booking, and Scorecard Submission since those are what make the platform actually useful. Supporting features like reminders and rescheduling were Medium, since the platform is functional without them, just less polished.

3. How did your simulated sprint align with your plan?

Sprint 1 didn't fully complete — one story stayed in To Do and one in In Progress by the end, so it got carried over to Sprint 2 rather than finishing all 3 planned stories. That's a realistic outcome and shows why velocity tracking across sprints matters — the initial planned load was a bit optimistic.

4. What insights did the burndown chart give about your team's capacity?

The chart showed the remaining work not dropping to zero by the end of Sprint 1, meaning the team (in this case, just me) over-committed slightly for the sprint. It highlights that in a real scenario, velocity from Sprint 1 should inform how much to pull into Sprint 2, rather than assuming the same capacity each time.
